Alveolar eczema. Alveolar eczema is a very well-recognized childhood disease that typically begins in the first or second year of life as red, raised, itchy, sometimes blistered patches in the mouth, armpits, ears, scalp, neck, or groin. The lesions are usually pruritic and increase in severity during time. The attacks may be exacerbated or halted by environmental, seasonal, or food factors. Daughters were called "Little Mice" due to the itchy rash. The red, inflamed lesions are generally not scaly. They may be bordered by a fine, pink, pruritic, serpiginous line, which may sometimes cross the blisters and be difficult to spot. The skin may show evidence of a local allergic reaction when scratched or licked. Severe cases can lead to death and, in general, start in the first or second year of life, peaking between the ages of 6 and 10. Alveolar eczema is associated with a number of connective tissue disorders, such as Ehlers-Danlos syndrome, which is caused by mutations in type IX collagen, or Marfan's syndrome, which is caused by mutations in a locus on chromosome 15. Alveolar eczema may also be associated with a number of food allergies, such as egg white, milk, or wheat allergies.

Symmetrical Alveolar Eczema In the late 1970s, the term discoid eczema was coined, to distinguish alveolar eczema, which had a focal, symmetrical distribution and is now called symmetrical alveolar eczema. The classical "oral" version has great cosmetic and social impact, but it needs a precise diagnosis to be treated. The latest classification, proposed by the 2004 Atlas of Oral Diseases, subdivides alveolar eczema into two different forms: alveolar eczema palpebralis and alveolar eczema petechialis. When the diagnosis is correct, alveolar eczema is "hormone sensitive," meaning that when the flare-up occurs, the patient experiences sudden onset of severe pain, swelling, and bright red rashes that are redder and more inflamed than other forms of eczema, such as atopic eczema. Very often, when this occurs, the skin turns into a burning sensation, as the skin becomes very sensitive and painful. Al
